New records obtained by CBS4 On Your Side show that three of the six dogs, that were put down after the attack and death of six-year-old Avery Jackson-Dunphy in Mesilla Park, New Mexico, were foster animals from the Animal Services Center of the Mesilla Valley.

The foster documents unveiled that three medium breed dogs, which was a mother, and her two puppies, were fostered by Jackson-Dunphy's grandfather, Kevin Owens on July 6.

A memo, that documented a check-in by the shelter with Owens on Aug. 7th, revealed that one of the dogs showed signs of aggression.

I talked with foster Kevin and he said that the pups are doing great. Getting bigger and healthy. But Mom is becoming little aggressive with him. He was cleaning the kennel and she nipped him from behind. Akira didn't bite him but she gave him a sign that he needed to get away from her pups. She will growl at them if they touch the pups. I let him know to when he going to bring the pups, for him to take mom out to use the bathroom and then take the babies. Will try that. He also told me that once the pups are okay to be away from mom and will separate them. He is willing to work with her for a month after to see if her aggressive behavior changes.
